Excerpt: . . . 11 park acreage impacted by the recent wildfires provided these species with the per-fect opportunity to spread throughout the park. Invasive weeds can alter an area by, among other things, disrupting the natural food web, promoting soil erosion, and interfering with natural plant succession. Rapid deforestation promptly followed by non-native weed infestation can quickly convert rare native forests into an impaired landscape. These impacts have also affected such federally-listed species as the Mexican spotted owl and its habitat (Johnson et al 2008). The park has made some important efforts to slow down the spread of invasive weeds. Direct control of weeds with mechanical, chemical, and biological control tac-tics have been applied in some areas in some years. Several larger areas burned in recent wildfires have been treated by aerially seeding with native grasses to quickly reestablish competitive native species. This has been proven to be very cost effective if done promptly after wildfires. But, in the long-term, the parks forests may not fully...
