Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Carbohydrate Economy of Cacti The purpose of this work has been primarily to gather data and some necessary facts which could be brought to converge for an attack on the problems of photosynthesis. Experiments which have been in progress in the Desert Laboratory at Tucson for several years have indicated clearly that prerequisite to a rational discussion of the problems concerning the manner in which sugars are formed in the chlorophyllous leaf is a clearer understanding of the conditions governing the equilibria and mutual transr formations of the various groups of carbohydrates in the leaf, as well as of the fate of these substances in the general metabolism. The complex and manifold character of the phenomenon of photosynthesis has, it would seem, not been very generally realized by workers in this field. The avenue of approach which appears most promising at this stage at least is that which employs chemical methods and conceptions. However, in following this line of attack, the dangers of reasoning from knowledge gained purely from in vitro investigations can hardly be overemphasized. Furthermore, consistent and valid results with living material can be gained only by the most careful control of conditions, such as temperature, water relations, light, and the previous history of the plant While it is, of course, highly desirable to know the behavior of plants in the field and to develop methods for gaining such knowledge, it seems to the writer that a realization of this ideal can be hoped for only after the more fundamental principles of the phenomenon have been learned. In the study of photosynthesis it is impossible to segregate entirely the activity of sugar...
