Duplicate determinations should check within.01 total carbon, equivalent to about 0.0007 g CO. on a two-gram sample. 1 Before starting a single determination, or a series of determinations, the apparatus should be connected up and sufficient oxygen passed through to burn out any carbon contained in the asbestos plugs and to sweep out the air originally in the train. The further passage of oxygen should produce no increase in the weight of absorption bulb. 2 Care must be observed to prevent the furnace attaining a temperature of much over 1000 C, as cupric oxide fuses at 1064c C. and when this occurs the silica tube slags with the fused oxide and invariably cracks on cooling. A temperature of over 825 C. is necessary to insure decomposition of carbonates. Drawing the gas through by suction is found preferable to forcing it through by pressure, it being much easier to prevent leakage. Any error from this source would be comparatively insignificant as the leakage would be inward rather than outward. The content of G02 in ordinary air is such that it would require an inward leakage of approximately 160 cc. to cause an increase of 0.0001 g. In the weight of the absorption bulb. All connections, where possible, were made of rubber stoppers, these being less liable to develop leaks than connections of rubber tubing. 4 The Fleming absorption bulb was found to be...
